Northern California Weather Synopsis

RED FLAG WARNING

 Relatively dry thunderstorms developing later today in the southern areas, spreading east and north overnight and Friday ***

An off shore low pressure system will arrive off the central California coast later today, move ashore this evening, and inland Friday. Relatively dry thunderstorms are expected to develop around the Bay Area as the system moves ashore late today. Thunderstorm development will spread east into the Sierra and western foothills tonight as the low moves inland. Thunderstorms will spread further north Friday and become wetter, but some will still be on the dry side, especially in the northern mountains. Areas along the Cascade/Sierra crest and eastward are likely to have the most active thunderstorm action Friday, and a few overnight storms may linger over NE California. There may also be a few afternoon and evening thunderstorms near the Oregon border Saturday.

Over the weekend, a low will drop south along the Canadian coast and continue to move south along our West Coast the first half of next week. For the most part this will keep a dry SW flow over North Ops, but there may be just enough moisture associated with the low for some showers or isolated thunderstorms over the western mountains Monday through next Wednesday.

Temperatures will remain seasonably warm, with the warmest inland valleys mostly in the lower and mid 90s for the next week. Afternoon winds will also be typically southerly to westerly 5-15 mph for the most part through the weekend at least.
